

As a frequent flyer, I am appalled that the FCC is considering permitting cellular telephone use onboard aircraft. It is one thing to have an inconsiderate boor speaking on a cell phone in a restaurant or bus where a person has the option of leaving, but it is an entirely different matter to allow such use on an airplane in an environment from which there is no escape. By permitting such use, you will be violating other passengers' right to peace and quiet in an already stressful environment. If you allow this, I predict an increase in "air rage" will be one result as exhausted travelers argue with inconsiderate, selfish louts who believe that it is their right to broadcast their personal conversations to everyone within ten rows of their seat.
